Origins of the Robinson Surname

The surname Robinson traces its roots to the medieval era, specifically to the reign of William the Conqueror in England. Following his successful invasion in 1066, William embarked on a systematic distribution of land and titles among his loyal followers. Many of these Norman nobles adopted the suffix "-son" to denote their paternal lineage, indicating their status as the "son of" a particular ancestor.

In the case of Robinson, the name likely originated from a combination of the Norman personal name "Robert" and the aforementioned "-son" suffix. Robert was a common name among the Norman aristocracy, and its popularity as a given name is reflected in the widespread distribution of the surname Robinson today.
